

Wealth
Management

the Navigator

INVESTMENT, TAX AND LIFESTYLE PERSPECTIVES FROM RBC WEALTH MANAGEMENT SERVICES

Aaron Fennell, MBA, CFA
Portfolio Manager & Investment
Advisor
Tel: 416-313-6397
aaron.fennell@rbc.com

RBC Dominion Securities
181 Bay Street, Suite 2350
Toronto, ON M5J 2T3
www.aaronfennell.com

Transferring future growth of a security to your spouse

Examining the strategy of transferring the future appreciation of a security to your spouse without triggering the income attribution rules

If you hold a security that you expect will significantly increase in value and you'd like to have its future appreciation taxed in the hands of your spouse rather than in yours, this article discusses a tax planning approach that may help you achieve this without triggering the income attribution rules.

Any reference to spouse in this article also includes a common-law partner.

Why might you transfer an appreciating security to your spouse?

You want to achieve income splitting with your lower-income spouse

Income splitting is a tax-saving strategy available within Canada's progressive tax system (i.e. the more income you earn, the higher your marginal tax rate), making it possible to shift income from a family member who's taxed at a higher marginal tax rate to one who's taxed at a lower marginal rate. If you have a lower-income spouse, you may be able to transfer a security you currently own and that you anticipate will increase in value to your spouse in order to have any future capital gain taxed in your lower-income spouse's hands.

If you simply gift the security to your spouse, however, any first-generation investment income earned on the security and the future capital gain will be subject to the attribution rules. If these rules apply, the income and capital gains will be attributed back to you and taxable to you for income tax purposes.

Your spouse has unused capital losses but no capital gains

If your spouse has carried forward capital losses, it may be beneficial to transfer a security you anticipate will appreciate in value to your spouse. By doing so, this may allow their unused capital losses to offset any future capital gains from the transferred security, which could potentially result in a tax-free capital gain.

Transferring the security

The following are three common ways to implement this strategy while ensuring you do not trigger the attribution rules:

You sell your security on the open market and your spouse purchases the same security with their own funds

Provided your spouse purchases the security for the fair market value (FMV) with their own money, you will not trigger the attribution rules, and any future capital gain (or loss) will be taxable in your spouse's hands. You will need to report any capital gain triggered by selling the security on the open market on your tax return in the year of sale.

Transfer the security to your spouse "in-kind" for FMV

Instead of you selling the security on the open market and then your spouse purchasing the same security, you may consider transferring the security to your spouse "in-kind" (i.e. transferring the actual security). To avoid triggering the attribution rules, your spouse will need to pay you FMV for the security, using their own funds. Keep in mind that you're selling the security, so you'll realize any capital gain on the transfer. The cost base of the security received by your spouse will generally be the FMV of the security on the date of transfer.

When considering this method, please consult with your RBC advisor about how to best accommodate your request from an administrative standpoint. There could also be additional tax preparation fees since you have to make an election with your income tax return to transfer the security to your spouse at FMV.

Lend cash to your spouse to fund their purchase of the same security

If your spouse isn't able to purchase your security with their own money, consider lending them the funds or taking back a promissory note at the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) prescribed rate to ensure the income attribution rules don't apply. With this approach, the security would be sold on the open market and you would report any associated capital gain realized in the year of sale. You would lend cash to your spouse at the CRA prescribed rate and your spouse would use these funds to purchase the same security on the open market. Alternatively, you could sell the security to your spouse and take a note that charges the CRA prescribed rate as consideration.

If your spouse isn't able to purchase your security with their own money, consider lending them the funds or taking back a promissory note at the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) prescribed rate to ensure the income attribution rules don't apply.

When considering this method, you'll want to take into account the tax impact of using a prescribed rate loan. Your spouse will be able to deduct the interest they pay you, and you have to include the interest you earn on the loan in your income for tax purposes. Depending on the circumstances, using this method may be less tax-effective than your spouse purchasing the security with their own money.

For more information regarding this strategy, please ask your RBC advisor for an article on the spousal loan strategy.

Special considerations

Attribution rules

When implementing this strategy, it's important to ensure the transaction doesn't trigger the income attribution rules. This can be achieved by ensuring your spouse pays FMV for the security. If the attribution rules are triggered, you'll be required to report any future appreciation (i.e. capital gain) and income on your tax return, even if your spouse is holding the security in their own name.

Superficial loss rules (if securities are in a loss position)

If your securities are currently in a loss position but you'd like to transfer them to your spouse based on your expectation that they'll increase in value in the future, it's important to be aware of the superficial loss rules. If your sale of the security and the subsequent purchase of the same security by your spouse triggers the superficial loss rules, you won't be able to use the capital loss accrued on the security. Instead, your loss will be added to the cost base of the identical security that your spouse purchased, and this may defeat the purpose of the strategy.

To avoid triggering the superficial loss rules, your spouse can consider waiting 30 days from the settlement date on which you sell your security before they repurchase the same security. If you transfer the security in-kind to your spouse, your spouse would need to dispose of the security so they don't own the security on the 30th day after the transfer. Please ask your RBC advisor for an article on the superficial loss rules for more information.

Conclusion

If you hold a security you expect is going to appreciate significantly in value, you may benefit from transferring it to your spouse, if your spouse is in a lower tax bracket or if they have unused capital losses. The approach you choose to transfer the security — and whether it may be beneficial or not — will depend on your situation and whether your spouse has their own funds to facilitate the transaction. With this in mind, it's important to seek advice from a qualified tax advisor with respect to your personal situation.

This article may contain strategies, not all of which will apply to your particular financial circumstances. The information in this article is not intended to provide legal, tax or insurance advice. To ensure that your own circumstances have been properly considered and that action is taken based on the latest information available, you should obtain professional advice from a qualified tax, legal and/or insurance advisor before acting on any of the information in this article.

If you hold a security you expect is going to appreciate significantly in value, you may benefit from transferring it to your spouse, if your spouse is in a lower tax bracket or if they have unused capital losses.

Wealth
Management

This document has been prepared for use by the RBC Wealth Management member companies, RBC Dominion Securities Inc. (RBC DS)*, RBC Phillips, Hager & North Investment Counsel Inc. (RBC PH&N IC), RBC Global Asset Management Inc. (RBC GAM), Royal Trust Corporation of Canada and The Royal Trust Company (collectively, the "Companies") and their affiliates, RBC Direct Investing Inc. (RBC DI) *, RBC Wealth Management Financial Services Inc. (RBC WMFS) and Royal Mutual Funds Inc. (RMFI). *Member-Canadian Investor Protection Fund. Each of the Companies, their affiliates and the Royal Bank of Canada are separate corporate entities which are affiliated. "RBC advisor" refers to Private Bankers who are employees of Royal Bank of Canada and mutual fund representatives of RMFI, Investment Counsellors who are employees of RBC PH&N IC, Senior Trust Advisors and Trust Officers who are employees of The Royal Trust Company or Royal Trust Corporation of Canada, or Investment Advisors who are employees of RBC DS. In Quebec, financial planning services are provided by RMFI or RBC WMFS and each is licensed as a financial services firm in that province. In the rest of Canada, financial planning services are available through RMFI, Royal Trust Corporation of Canada, The Royal Trust Company, or RBC DS. Estate and trust services are provided by Royal Trust Corporation of Canada and The Royal Trust Company. If specific products or services are not offered by one of the Companies or RMFI, clients may request a referral to another RBC partner. Insurance products are offered through RBC Wealth Management Financial Services Inc., a subsidiary of RBC Dominion Securities Inc. When providing life insurance products in all provinces except Quebec, Investment Advisors are acting as Insurance Representatives of RBC Wealth Management Financial Services Inc. In Quebec, Investment Advisors are acting as Financial Security Advisors of RBC Wealth Management Financial Services Inc. RBC Wealth Management Financial Services Inc. is licensed as a financial services firm in the province of Quebec. The strategies, advice and technical content in this publication are provided for the general guidance and benefit of our clients, based on information believed to be accurate and complete, but we cannot guarantee its accuracy or completeness. This publication is not intended as nor does it constitute tax or legal advice. Readers should consult a qualified legal, tax or other professional advisor when planning to implement a strategy. This will ensure that their individual circumstances have been considered properly and that action is taken on the latest available information. Interest rates, market conditions, tax rules, and other investment factors are subject to change. This information is not investment advice and should only be used in conjunction with a discussion with your RBC advisor. None of the Companies, RMFI, RBC WMFS, RBC DI, Royal Bank of Canada or any of its affiliates or any other person accepts any liability whatsoever for any direct or consequential loss arising from any use of this report or the information contained herein. ®/™ Registered trademarks of Royal Bank of Canada. Used under licence. © 2022 Royal Bank of Canada. All rights reserved. NAV0049 (02/22)