We continue to provide our clients with the very best structure to get through challenging markets like we experienced in October and December of last year.

Today, we want to provide you with some insight into the life of the founder of one of the companies we partner with to help manage a portion of our clients' assets as well as honor the life of one giant man.

On January 16, Vanguard founder John "Jack" Bogle passed away at age 89 in his Bryn Mawr home.

Search the Internet for "Bogle" or browse any news source and you'll soon be immersed in a universal outpouring of respect for the man. Rightfully so. His lifetime of unblinking commitment to busting open the doors of Wall Street and tearing down its shibboleths is unmatched by anyone else we know.

Reducing costs, avoiding hyperactive trades, insisting on fiduciary, transparent financial care ... these may seem obvious today. But it was in large part Bogle who conceived them all and, at times, was ridiculed for doing so. He did not care; he spoke up anyway, every chance he got.

This excerpt from The Philadelphia Inquirer, Bogle's home-town paper, epitomizes our feelings:

"Jack could have been a multibillionaire on a par with Gates and Buffett," said William Bernstein, an Oregon investment manager and author of 12 books on finance and economic history. Instead, he turned his company into one owned by its funds, and in turn their investors, "that exists to provide its customers the lowest price. He basically chose to forgo an enormous fortune to do something right for millions of people. I don't know any other story like it in American business history."

Bogle's legacy makes it abundantly clear that day by day, choice by choice, year after year, accumulating patient, positive steps toward a positive outcome without focus on one's self is the key to a life well lived.

A Book, an App & a Website

Book: The MOST IMPORTANT THING
